Inks based on water as the continuous phase contain fewer potential contaminants, such as paper mill sludge, and as a result exhibit improved properties such as penetration and improved fade. To date, however, the use of such water-based inks has been limited because of the inherent low droplet generation efficiency of the water-based printhead. Consequently, such a water-based ink is usually diluted with a substantial amount of ink carrier such as water. Prior art approaches to the problem of low droplet formation for water-based inks have largely involved improvements in the printhead. Printer manufacturers have modified printheads by narrowing the orifice, operating the printhead at higher pressures, and improving the spacing between the orifices. Because of the inherent limitations of the physical principles of the inkjet technology, improvements in these parameters have resulted in only slight gains in the number of drops formed in the printhead. Consequently, more aggressive development and refinement of water-based inks are required. One solution to the problem of low droplet formation from water-based inks involves the provision of surface-active agents to stabilize the dispersions, thus improving the wetting characteristics of the ink. U.S. Pat. No. 4,504,138, issued Mar. 12, 1985, and U.S. Pat. No. 4,789,565, issued Dec. 6, 1988, both to Okabe et al., describe various fluorine-containing surface active agents. Surfactants produced from perfluoroalkylpolyethers exhibit improved wetting characteristics and low surface tension, thereby greatly reducing the generation of satellite droplets. U.S. Pat. No. 4,789,565 in particular describes the production of perfluoroalkylsulfonates and perfluoroalkylcarboxylates from a perfluoroalkylpolyether and a sulfuric or a carboxylic acid. The basic characteristics of water-based inks containing surface-active agents, or the effect of additives in improving the quality
