Field of the Invention The present invention relates to audio data compression and playback. More specifically, the present invention relates to an apparatus and method of data compression and playback of sequential data, such as video data and audio data, for example, in MPEG-2. 2. Related Art MPEG-2 is an international standard and a popular video coding standard. The MPEG-2 standard specifies a method to compress video by eliminating redundancy in the temporal and spatial domain. Since high-quality video requires more data than can be transported by a single channel, MPEG-2 employs compression methods that reduce or remove redundancies in the temporal and spatial domains. One compression technique is known as motion compensation, a frame-to-frame compression scheme. Another compression technique is known as discrete cosine transform, which is employed in many new compression standards, such as H.264/AVC (ISO/IEC 14496-10 Part 10). For both compression techniques, the entropy coding section, which is used to efficiently encode the resulting compressed data, is responsible for most of the complexity. In MPEG-
